Right to Life essay

Have you ever thought about the fact that even George Washington had a beginning? George Washington defeated the most powerful empire in the world, founded a republic that stretched across a continent, and stepped away from power after eight years as America's first president. Yet even George Washington began as a baby in his mother's womb. Everyone has a beginning and a reason to be alive.

A single unborn baby is more valuable than all the stars in the sky because the purpose and ultimate end of each person is greater than that of a star. Each person's purpose and value exists at the very beginning of their life, even if no one is able to recognize it. For example, people would laugh at Albert Einstein's ideas, yet Einstein went on to become an official genius, and a great inventor. Similarly, Eleanor Roosevelt was neglected and scorned from an early age but eventually became first lady. Even the most powerful people in the world were once small infants.

From the moment of conception every person is given a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. There is no person without a beginning, no matter how powerful. Finally, there is no one without a reason to exist no matter how small they might be.
